Dust jacket notes: "This is a selection from a decade of work by one of the great masters of photography in our time. In a statement on 'the essential photographic act', Aaron Siskind has said: 'The start is from a previous picture. There is no preconception, rather predisposition (which predisposition includes the camera, lenses and the film with me at the time). I will usually return to a familiar place or one that seems familiar. I stand still or move slowly, feeling things like the impulse of shapes, the direction of lines, the quality of surfaces. I frame with my eye (sometimes with my hands) as the ground glass would frame. Nothing that one could reasonably call thinking is taking place at this stage. The condition is total absorption; the decision (a picture!) is spontaneous....Ambiguity may be the clue: there is the material, and there am I intruding my private intent. I know the imminence of the world and experience it with full sensuality; at the same time I am involved with the projection of myself as idea. Strong tensions are inevitable, pleasurable and disturbing. Is not the esthetic optimum order with the tensions continuing?' Order with the tensions continuing" -- the artist's precisely expressed key to the unique creative insights here made manifest. In these incomparable photographs we experience that constant renewal of perception which is the essence of art. The introduction by Harold Rosenberg is an intensely illuminating essay on the artist and his work; and, as always, on the highest level of contemporary critical writing. Born and educated in New York, Aaron Siskind taught English in the public schools there for more than twenty years and has, as he says, 'a spiritual attachment to the place.' It was not until his thirties that he came to photography (out of a background of poetry and music which had absorbed him almost exclusively until then)...."
