From distances away, the sound of beating footsteps came toward the sleepy street. The footsteps came closer and closer, causing a stir and alarm against the calm. A young, tall, but curvy woman ran out of the darkness with her clothes torn and her swollen eyes looking around manically for help. Blood ran down her arms, legs, and lip, and she appeared to be running from someone - or something.

A bored man drove down the familiar street quietly. He hummed to the calm music in his car and turned on his air conditioner to keep himself awake. He brought his face close to the vent, letting the air freeze his face for a moment. He looked up to see the young woman appear in his headlights. His amber eyes grew wide as he slammed on the brakes. He stopped nearly in time but still hit the girl with the final lurch of the car stopping.

“You know, you really shouldn’t be running in the middle of the street in the middle of the night,” the man said as he tried to keep his voice calm. “You could have been killed.”

The woman pawed at his shirt desperately, “Please, please help me. Save me - they’re after me.”

“Who’s...”

Before he could finish, the woman fainted into his arms. He frowned and pulled her into the car, laying her in the backseat. He rubbed his forehead, too tired to handle this kind of stress.
